Ground Disturbing Practices are those practices that have a high potential to affect cultural resources when installed according to standard NRCS criteria. These practices are to be considered as Undertakings.

Potentially Ground Disturbing Practices are those practices that may affect cultural resources unless they are installed under two different situations. First the installation of the practices will not exceed the depth, extent, or kind of previous cultivation(s). Second, if the land has not been previously cultivated, and the installation of the practice will result in no ground disturbance. If these situations apply, than the practices are not undertakings.

Not Ground Disturbing Practices are primarily management related and will not have any physical effects or alter a cultural resource. These practices are not undertakings and do not require cultural resources considerations.

1. Because of the safety issues involved with well-decommissioning, it will normally be considered as non-ground disturbing. Special cases involving historic resources can apply, so be careful.
2. This practice should be considered ground-disturbing unless it has previously been used in the same location.
